Joan Miró said that The Birth of the World depicts “a sort of genesis”—the amorphous beginnings of life. To make this work, Miró poured, brushed, and flung paint on an unevenly primed canvas so that the paint soaked in some areas and rested on top in others. Atop this relatively uncontrolled application of paint, he added.

2 Feb 2017 . Radical use of materials is the leitmotif of modernism. Yet, for Miró, it was the means to a particular end: "I want to assassinate painting". This declaration, made to French art critic Maurice Raynal in 1927, marked the beginning of a lifelong commitment to challenging painterly convention. An important work.
